When art means Everything

The Museum of Everything – the only British museum dedicated to unintentional, untrained and undiscovered artists of the 19th, 20th and 21st centuries – is back in London with a brand new installation.

Exhibition #4, the first international survey of studios for contemporary artists with developmental issues, is currently showing at Selfridges in Oxford Street.

Some 50 new discoveries and more than 400 works form the most expansive art collaboration in the history of the department store.

Exhibition #4, the largest project The Museum of Everything has staged so far, occupies all the store's windows on Oxford Street. The main show is in the Ultralounge and features an installation created with Eve Stewart, designer of the Oscar-winning film The King's Speech.

Highlights include Japanese wrestle-maniac Tomoyuki Shinki, West Coast social activist William Scott and visionary architect Stefan Hafner, whose City of the Future adorns the corner window on Orchard Street.

In the Wonder Room, The Shop of Everything is selling bespoke merchandise to benefit the museum and its artists, including editioned prints and fashion collaborations with designers Clements Ribeiro and Tracy Neuls, also available at www.shopevery.com.

Other events include talks, screenings and the launch of Everything #4, a book of the show featuring conversations with Cindy Sherman, Sir Ken Robinson, Chris Dercon and David Byrne.

The event also launches The Workshops of Everything charity, an initiative to encourage workshops for artists with disabilities across Britain. The museum will run several workshops during the show and invites creative adults with developmental and other disabilities to participate on we@musevery.com.

A digital version called Exhibition #4d can be viewed online at www.digevery.com.

● The Museum of Everything, Exhibition #4, runs until October 25 at Selfridges & Co, 400 Oxford Street, W1, Monday to Saturday 9.30am-8pm, Sunday 11.30am-6pm. More information at www.musevery.com, www.shopevery.com.
